Living a Whole, Healthy Life

As a child I remember arguing with my mother about how when I grew up I would be able to do whatever I wanted to do. Mom never sat back and took my words to heart in a defensive way. She always said back to me, "When you grow up you will have the responsibilities of an adult."

What I discovered was a path of greater responsibility for each phase of my life. Driving one of Dad and mom's cars changed to owning my car and paying for gas and insurance. This changed to buying my own groceries and clothing and saving for retirement. Getting married meant I had another person for whom I shared responsibility. Having Children meant two more people and my thinking had to change to accommodate their needs.

Living a whole, healthy life is about taking on the responsibilities as a part of living. It means knowing what we need to do and doing it. It means realizing our adolescent fantasies are just that...fantasies. True joy comes when we can give ourselves in meaningful ways, addressing the responsibilities of life and seeing them as the reason for living. Joy is a byproduct of a life well lived.
